TEACHING

Teaching Philosophy

I believe that it is crucial to create a learning environment that is both interesting and engaging to students. Through methods such as: case studies, critical questioning, small group discussion, student-led projects and presentations, practical application of concepts learned in class, and journaling, I believe that students in my classes learn not only to absorb and retain information, but also to communicate and apply what they have learned. This cannot be accomplished through relying solely on lectures and multiple choice tests. It is my goal that my students are able to explain what they have learned at the end of the semester, and to also be able to demonstrate practical application of the knowledge gained from the class. For online courses, I strongly believe in active daily participation from both the students and myself. I encourage my students to search for both current research and current events that apply to the information being learned in the class and share them with their classmates. This allows for daily discussion of how the theory being learned in the course relates to practice.
